At length, after three months had clapsed, the lansuit was decided in favour of Lord Craquair, and Will was directed to set the resident at liberty. Accordingly, he entered the vault at dead of night, seized the President, muffled him once more in the clock, without speaking a single word, and using the same mole of transportition, conveyed him to Leith sands, and set down the aston shed judge on the very spot where he had taken him up. The joy of his friends, and the less agreeable surprise of his successor, may be easily con crived, when he appeared in court to re laim his office and honours. All embraced his own persuasion, that he had been spirited away by ritchcraft, nor could be himself be convinced of the contrary, until many years afterwards happening to travel in Anna tale, his ears were saluted once more with the sounds of Maudge and Batty, the only notes which had solaced his long confinement. This led to a ry Lord of Sessions, 10th July, 1621, and died at his own house in Durie July 1346.
